Hill Air Force Base History

Bordered by the colorful Wasatch Mountains to the east and overlooking the Great Salt Lake (remainder of the Ancient Lake Bonneville) to the west, the site selected for Hill AFB is unique. The history of the base is also colorful and unique in the annals of the United States Air Force.

On July 1, 1939, Congress appropriated $8 million for establishment and construction of the Ogden Air Depot. Five months later, the War Department designated the site as Hill Field in honor of the Major Ployer P Hill, who lost his life in 1935 at Wright-Patterson AFB, Ohio, while piloting a B-17 Flying Fortress.

Groundbreaking ceremonies, attended by local dignitaries took place January 12, 1940. Approximately 10 months later, Hill Field was officially activated. Lt Col (later Brig General) Morris Berman assumed command November 7, 1940. The new installation soon proved to be the strategic intermountain depot General "Hap" Arnold and other far-sighted leaders visualized it to be.

During WWII, battle weary B-17, B-24, B-29, P-40 and A-20 aircraft depended on Hill for rehabilitation. In response, the work force, which grew to a peak of 22,000 in 1943, provided aircraft repair, engines and parts needed to return them to combat. This support included establishing the progressive assembly line for B-24 Liberator Bombers. Personnel also performed important wartime work at the nearby Wendover Range by completing training in air combat operations and aircraft and munitions maintenance. Crews of the 509th Composite Group, practiced bombing runs at the Wendover Range, including those in preparation for the Hiroshima and Nagasaki missions that ended WWII.

On September 18, 1947, the Army Air Corps became the United States Air Force, ending an association with the Army that had lasted 40 years. Following an Air Force wide pattern of renaming fields as bases, Hill Field became an Air Force Base on February 5, 1948.

During the early post-war years, Hill became a storage and disposition site for vast numbers of airplanes and items of support equipment. By the end of 1947 more than $200 million worth of aircraft had been preserved to near perfection condition for possible future use. When North Korea invaded South Korea in 1950, Hill personnel quickly removed B-29's and B-26's from storage and added them to the active Air Force inventory.

In 1953, Ogden Air Material Area, the ranking activity at Hill, engaged in logistical support of more sophisticated aircraft. The F-89 Scorpion, the first jet maintenance project here, was followed by the F-84, the F-101 Voodoo, which became the Ogden AMA-Managed weapon in 1952, also became a significant depot workload in the 1950's.

Hill's acreage doubled in size April 1, 1955, when the Department of Defense added the adjacent Ogden Arsenal property. This is now the "West Area" of Hill. The new acreage added more than 600 buildings and structures. As a result, the base capabilities substantially increased.

In January 1959, the Air Force named Hill as the single assembly and recycling point for Minuteman Missiles. Subsequently, it became the center of the Air Force missile program in the 1960's when Boeing Company specially constructed facilities to assemble the Minuteman ICBM, while Ogden AMA handled depot-level maintenance on them.

Hill also played an important role in the nation's fighter capability. Ogden AMA, which became Ogden Air Logistics Center April 1, 1974 was logistics manager for the F-4 Phantom, the fastest and most versatile jet fighter in the Air Force inventory during the 1960's and much of the 1970's. The center built a specialized repair capability that enabled the base to provide depot-level maintenance on more than 200 of the jets each year.

In 1980, 40 years from its beginning, the base had another new star, the multi-national F-16 Fighting Falcon, which possesses capabilities unsurpassed by any other aircraft in the world. The center was designed as logistics manager for the aircraft and the 388th Tactical Fighter Wing was the first to get the new fighter.

In addition to the F-16's, F-4's and Minuteman, the center's mission also includes the Bomarc drone missile, Maverick air-to-ground missile, Walleye laser and electro-optical guide bombs, Emergency Rocket Communication system, Titan and Peacekeeper missiles. Air munitions, aircraft landing gears, wheels, brakes, tires and tubes, photographic reconnaissance equipment and aerospace training and simulation equipment make up its workload.

From modest beginnings, Hill AFB now ranks as Utah's largest employer. Approximately 20,000 military and civilian contract personnel are employed. The payroll is over $500 million, and the presence of the installation injects growth into Utah's economy. The base now consists of 6,698 acres of land, compared to the original 3,000. Current value of real estate, buildings, improvements, and equipment exceeds $4.5 billion.
